Stories of Survival

“He’s unbelievable—his work ethic. He’s just a machine,” said Brain Loeffler, the Loyola University head swimming coach who also trains Snyder at the school’s recreation center.

“You can’t help but be inspired by him,” Loeffler was talking about Brad Snyder. Snyder is a blind swimmer who recently competed in the 2016 Paralympic Games. He overcame adversity and disability—developing success through his tireless work ethic. Snyder, despite his blindness, demanded to succeed and overcome. The amount of traumatic experiences one may experience in life may be endless. People handle these experiences in one of two ways. In one case, there are some people can just move on and just overcome their obstacles. On the other hand, some people can never get over them, and still get flashbacks every now and then.

In life, everyone faces difficult/traumatic challenges. There are times that a challenge is really easy to get over and shake off. This is proven by the text, “Life after Japan’s Tsunami is Difficult…” when it states: “Akemi Solloway founded a charity group called Aid for Japan. It supports orphans of the tsunami.” This evidence demonstrates that even though Akemi, a tsunami survivor, lost his parents, he decided to move on and instead help other people that are suffering from the same thing. Furthermore the text “Not Just for the Gold: Paralympic Swimmer Wants to Help Others Aim High” states: “He’s not just thinking about keeping himself busy. Snyder hopes to be able to keep inspiring others to meet their own challenges with courage." This evidence shows that Synder has moved on from his injury and wants to help others overcome their own challenges.

Conversely, some people can’t get over traumatic challenges, and they’re still stuck on what happened to them. This is also validated by the text, “Life after Japan’s Tsunami is Difficult...” when it states: “More than half of those still live in their hometowns,” said Ichio Yamada. He works for the town’s board of education. March 2nd, this year, is the fifth anniversary after the tsunami. “The children feel very uneasy as the anniversary approaches and many of them have flashbacks.” This evidence demonstrates that even 5 years after the tsunami, some kids still aren’t over their parent’s death---they still feel very uneasy living with the memories that surround them in their hometown. Furthermore, the same text states, “After staying with relatives, Naho became sad and returned to live in Shimizu. She did not want to go back to school and missed almost three years of classes”. This evidence demonstrates that after Naho’s parents died, it affected her drastically---so much so that she missed school three entire years of school because of it. Thus, a person can see how sometimes people can’t get over traumatic experiences.

Traumatic experiences can happen to anyone, and they’re very unexpected. In my opinion, traumatic experiences affect how we grow, change and learn as a person. If you, for example, almost get hit by a car, in the future, you’ll learn to look both ways when you cross the street and you’ll be more careful. Conclusively, traumatic experiences can be possible to get over with time.
